ABSTRACT

Within the alternative development paradigm, needs-based models have been critiqued for the part they play in accentuating local deficiency and thereby increasing dependency on externally-driven development. The asset-based approach to community development (ABCD) has been presented as a capacities-focused alternative, aimed at establishing community-driven development and promoting authentic local empowerment.

This thesis presents a case study into ABCD as it has been applied in a developing country context, analysing it in relationship to some of the theoretical premises of the approach and the wider development literature. The research, undertaken on the island of Mindanao in the Philippines, describes how the ABCD model was implemented and adapted to local circumstances. The findings indicate that the ABCD intervention resulted in improvements within the case study community, particularly pertaining to the expansion of community facilities, livelihood choices, household incomes, individual and collective motivation, and community pride.

Overall, this study endorses ABCD as an effective approach to development in the developing world, while at the same time highlighting issues associated with its implementation. Questions are also raised regarding three global development themes that emerged in the course of the study, namely the development of capacity, the management of social process and the meaning of empowerment.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I am appreciative toward the people of Midkiwan on the island of Mindanao for what was a warm and friendly welcome to a strange Kiwi who happened into their community one afternoon in June 2004. The completion of this research project is due to their co-operation, and their thoughtful and candid reflections. One resident challenged me when she asked if I considered the people there poor compared with the people in New Zealand. At the risk of appearing both patronising and clichéd, it must be acknowledged that despite their material impoverishment the residents of this locality possess a remarkable richness of spirit and strength of community that made a strong impression on me. I thank them sincerely.

I am grateful to the staff of Xavier University College of Agriculture in Cagayan de Oro, and in particular Rachel Polestico, who made every effort to assist me to carry out the research programme and to host me in the warm-hearted Filipino style. I recognise the pioneering work of institutions such as Xavier University in seeking out cutting-edge models of community development and in displaying a profound commitment to poverty alleviation in the Philippines. I thank my fellow classmates from many developing countries who shared with me the learning journey into Asset-Based Community Development (ABCD) provided to us by the staff members of the Southeast Asia Rural Social Leadership Institute (SEARSOLIN) in the Philippines. The warm friendships that have resulted are an inspiration for further multi-cultural learning.

I recognise with gratitude the support of Massey University in making the resources available to me to complete this thesis. I thank my supervisors, Professor John Overton and Dr. Manu Barcham, for their guidance, humour and many lively discussions. They challenged me to extend my thinking and further my abilities and I value this mentoring. I appreciate the comradeship, support and sense of fun displayed by my colleagues in the Development Studies Institute at Massey University. It has been a privilege to work alongside and learn from these dedicated people. I wish to acknowledge the invaluable technical support made available by Ri Weal, and editing assistance provided by Karen Beard, in the final preparation of this thesis.

I acknowledge the support and encouragement of my daughters, my friends, my mother and my family. Their confidence in my ability to complete this project has been, as ever, invaluable.
