Copyright is owned by the Author of the thesis. Permission is given for a copy to be downloaded by an individual for the purpose of research and private study only. The thesis may not be reproduced elsewhere without the permission of the Author.
THE EXPERIENCES OF REGISTERED NURSES IN POLYTECHNIC BACCALAUREATE DEGREE PROGRAMMES: AN INTERPRETIVE PHENOMENOLOGICAL STUDY

by

Philippa Seaton

A thesis presented in partial fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of

Master of Arts in Nursing

Massey University

1998
This interpretive phenomenological study examines the experience of registered nurses who returned to study for a baccalaureate degree in nursing at polytechnics in New Zealand. Although there are substantial numbers of registered nurses undertaking a first degree in nursing in the polytechnics, little New Zealand research exists related to this particular student group. The purpose of this research was to describe some of the common meanings embedded in the registered nurse students’ experiences, in order to reveal new possibilities for teaching and learning in registered nurse education.

Eleven registered nurses who had graduated from baccalaureate nursing degree programmes provided data, ten through interviews, and one through a written narrative. The transcribed interview texts and the written narrative were analysed using interpretive methodology based in a background philosophy of Heideggerian phenomenology.

Two major themes, Experiencing thinking, and Experiencing community, emerged. Closely interwoven, these themes describe how the registered nurses understood their degree experience as impacting on their thinking, and how sharing learning with other registered nurses contributed to changes in thinking. For registered nurses, clinical practice always constitutes the background to their degree studies. For some registered nurses, learning to think questioningly, opens up new possibilities in nursing practice and is a significant feature of the degree experience. For others, the degree is a reawakening of their expertise and understanding of their practice world as it is shared with others. The study describes how the common teaching and learning practices of reading, writing, and dialogue can contribute to students’ thinking and understanding are described. The central importance of learning with other registered nurses as part of the degree experience is explored. Contrary to the conventional notion of learning as an individual endeavour, these registered nurses describe how learning is a shared experience. The findings of this study are discussed in terms of the possibilities for teaching and learning in nursing education.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Many people have contributed to this thesis through their interest, encouragement and support. It would be impossible to name them all, but I extend my gratitude and thanks to them. I would especially like to make mention of:

The eleven participants, without whom this research would not have been possible. My most profound thanks go to you for the generous way you shared your experiences and thoughts with me. My deepest appreciation for your commitment to this research, that allowed you to share your stories with someone you didn’t know.

My research supervisors, Professor Julie Boddy and Professor Nancy Diekelmann. My sincere thanks for your guidance, and encouragement during the undertaking of the research and the writing of this thesis.

My husband Rennie Sykes, and our son Robbie. Thank you for your tolerance. You have both lived this study with me. Your love, understanding, and belief in me, have carried me through this work. Your involvement has given me space to write this thesis.

My sister, Lesley Seaton. My heart-felt thanks for all the times you have talked with me about nursing, teaching, and learning. You have shared much of this journey with me, and your support and encouragement have sustained me.

John Diekelmann and Dr Pamela Ironside. Thank you for your encouragement, and for showing me how scholarship is lived. John, I will always remember the times you shared Heidegger and philosophy with me. Pam, thank you for the generous sharing of thoughts about nursing education and interpretive phenomenology.

Professor Nancy Diekelmann, of the University of Wisconsin - Madison, to whom I owe special gratitude. You introduced me to Interpretive Phenomenology and taught me hermeneutic methods. You have also imparted much to me about teaching and learning.
Gabrielle Hall, my colleague. I am very grateful for your support. Thank you for the times you have been so willing to help with my teaching and professional responsibilities to give me time to write. You have been a wonderful listener, and companion in conversations about registered nurse education.

My friend Carol Murphy, for proof-reading, and your continuing support.

All the registered nurse students who wittingly, or unwittingly, have contributed to this research through the conversations we have had over the years, and my colleagues who likewise, have shared their experiences with registered nurse students, thank you.

Although they must remain anonymous, I extend my thanks to those polytechnics, particularly the nursing departments, who accepted my proposal and consented to assist me in gaining participants.

Finally, I would like to acknowledge and thank the Otago Polytechnic Research and Development Committee for their support, and the grant towards the cost of this study. My thanks also go to the Nursing and Midwifery department who have supported me with professional development time for writing this thesis.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

ABSTRACT .......................................................................................................................... II

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS ....................................................................................................... III

CHAPTER ONE - BACKGROUND TO THE STUDY .................................................................. 1
  INTRODUCTION .................................................................................................................. 1
  BACKGROUND TO THE INTRODUCTION OF BACCALAUREATE DEGREES IN NURSING ... 2
  VISION 2000: DEBATING THE FUTURE OF NURSING EDUCATION ................................ 7
  POTENTIAL RN STUDENTS FOR THE DEGREE PROGRAMME ....................................... 10
  BEGINNINGS OF THE RN BACCALAUREATE DEGREE ................................................ 11
  CONTEXTUALISING THE RESEARCHER’S INTEREST ...................................................... 12
  PURPOSE ............................................................................................................................ 13
  SUMMARY .......................................................................................................................... 13
  THESIS OUTLINE .............................................................................................................. 14

CHAPTER TWO - REVIEW OF LITERATURE ....................................................................... 18
  INTRODUCTION .................................................................................................................. 18
  OVERVIEW .......................................................................................................................... 18
  REGISTERED NURSES IN BACCALAUREATE EDUCATION .......................................... 20
  REENTRY ADULTS IN HIGHER EDUCATION .................................................................. 34
  CONTRIBUTIONS OF DIFFERING METHODOLOGIES ............................................... 36
  SUMMARY .......................................................................................................................... 38

CHAPTER THREE - THE INTERPRETIVE APPROACH .......................................................... 40
  INTRODUCTION .................................................................................................................. 40
  HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY ............................................................................................... 40
  TEXTUAL INTERPRETATION: HERMENEUTICS ............................................................... 49
  HEIDEGGERIAN HERMENEUTICS .................................................................................... 52
  METHODOLOGICAL CRITIQUES ....................................................................................... 56
  METHOD .............................................................................................................................. 60
  LIMITATIONS .................................................................................................................... 66
  SUMMARY .......................................................................................................................... 67