Copyright is owned by the Author of the thesis. Permission is given for a copy to be downloaded by an individual for the purpose of research and private study only. The thesis may not be reproduced elsewhere without the permission of the Author.
‘I’M NOT A WOMAN WRITER, BUT . . .’:
GENDER MATTERS IN NEW ZEALAND WOMEN’S
SHORT FICTION 1975-1995

A THESIS PRESENTED IN PARTIAL FULFILLMENT OF THE REQUIREMENTS FOR THE DEGREE OF

DOCTOR OF PHILOSOPHY
IN ENGLISH

AT MASSEY UNIVERSITY
PALMERSTON NORTH
NEW ZEALAND

JANE NICOLE LE MARQUAND
2006
From the late 1970s, New Zealand women short story writers increasingly worked their way into the literary mainstream. In the wake of the early, feminist-motivated years of the decade their gender, which had previously been the root of their marginalized position, began to work for them. However, rather than embracing womanhood, this growth in gender recognition led to many writers rejecting overt identification of their sex. To be a labeled a woman writer was considered patronising, a mark of inferiority. These women wanted to be known as writers only, some even expressing a hope for literature to reach a point of androgyny.

Their work, however, did not convey an androgynous perspective. Just as the fact of their gender could not be avoided, so the influence their sex had on their creativity cannot be denied. Gender does matter and New Zealand women’s short fiction published in the 1975-1995 period illustrates its significance. From the early trend for adopting fiction as a site for social commentary and political treatise against patriarchy’s one-dimensional image of woman, these stories show a gradually increasing awareness of fictional possibilities, allowing for celebration of the multiplicity of female experience and capturing a process of redefinition rather than rejection of ‘women’s work’. Though in the later 1990s it may no longer have been politically ‘necessary’ to promote women’s work on the grounds of gender, on a personal level the ‘difference of view’ of the woman writer remained both visible and vital. An increasing sense of woman-to-woman communication based on shared experience emerges: women are writing as women, about women, for women.
Acknowledgements

This thesis could not be considered complete without my expression of immense gratitude to the many individuals whose years of assistance and support made it all possible:

My supervisor, Dr William Broughton, whose vast knowledge was an ongoing source of inspiration, who maintained faith in me and in my work even through months of doubts and blank pages, and whose infinite measures of patience enabled this seemingly endless project to finally reach a conclusion.

My co-supervisor, Dr Mary Paul, who offered a fresh, insightful perspective and kept the challenge of the thesis alive.

Mark, for sharing the thesis journey and all its ups and downs.

My brothers, Sean and James, whose loyalty and silent support did not go unnoticed, and Seth, my little ray of sunshine.

Melanie and Michael, whose special friendship lifted my spirits and provided the perfect opportunity for temporary escapes southward.

My mother, Sue, who could always be counted on for understanding and encouragement when it was needed the most.

And Christopher, for his motivation and inspiration on the home-straight.

Sincere thanks must also be noted for the scholarship assistance granted me by Massey University for the research and writing of this thesis.
Table of Contents

Abstract \hspace{1cm} ii.
Acknowledgements \hspace{1cm} iii.
Table of Contents \hspace{1cm} iv.

Introduction \hspace{1cm} Questioning the Influence of Gender: Does it Matter? 1.
Chapter One \hspace{1cm} Domesticity and Beyond: First Steps Towards Redefinition in the Late 1970s 14.
Chapter Two \hspace{1cm} Celebration or Marginalization?: The Self-Sufficiency of the Early 1980s 30.
Chapter Three \hspace{1cm} Discarding the ‘Passive Victim’: Active Female Characters of the Late 1980s 66.
Chapter Four \hspace{1cm} ‘New’ versus ‘Old’: Thematic Highs and Lows And Technical Debates of the late 1980s 113.
Chapter Five \hspace{1cm} Held Back in Time: Fiction as Social Reflection Continues into the 1990s 159.
Chapter Six \hspace{1cm} Women Alone: The Freedom to Embrace Unlimited Possibilities 187.
Chapter Seven \hspace{1cm} Continuities and Changes: The Shifting Tide of a New Wave 233.
Chapter Eight \hspace{1cm} Political Motivation and Misrepresentation: Women’s Anthologies in the 1990s 276.
Conclusion \hspace{1cm} The Gifted Female Voice: Women to Women 322.

Works Cited \hspace{1cm} 331.