ABSTRACT

A work-from-home wardrobe for Air-Chair
Investigating \( \text{play + logic} = \text{wit} \) design

In my background as an art director in advertising, I used graphic wit as a communication tool to evoke emotion and connect with my audience; to trigger a smile in the hope of capturing their memories. The thought process behind wit is often a collision of two ideas which Koestler (1964, 35) refers to as ‘bisociation’. Heller (1991, 11) describes “wit and humour in design occur when play and logic are seamlessly intertwined”.

This research project uses \( \text{play + logic} = \text{wit} \) to explore practical furniture solutions through an intuitive and conceptually driven creative practice. Instead of dressing myself for work, I dress my work chair according to mood or business of the day. This activity revealed the lack of boundaries and transition between work and home and the effects humour can play on everyday life.

I have extrapolated this previous experience from 2D to 3D in the context of a collection of suits that dress Jasper Morrison’s Air-Chair. The unstructured, understated tactility and vivid colour palette of wool felt allows me to use local raw materials, to create a fabric to tailor the suits that suggests a language of three dimensional cartoon characters. In the act of dressing the chair for work, the suits invite me to an interlude of play. In a ritual transition between work and domesticity, the chair becomes a companion. The chair and I have a subtle dialogue, an experience that creates a platform to further explore lightness in everyday objects through wit.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS
Thanks to my supervisors, Julieanna Preston for freedom, trust and guidance, and to Lyn Garrett for offering me the challenge. Thanks to Wendy Neale for taking me under her wing and giving me hope and laughter. A special thanks to Russell for looking after me throughout this project with tender loving care. Thanks to my parents Marit and Ivar for bringing me up a playful being. And to my two lovely children Kirvil and Julius; this thesis is for you.

READERS GUIDE
This research project uses graphic wit to explore practical furniture solutions through an intuitive and conceptually-driven creative practice. It uses my own voice as a narrative and borrows the voices of an assembled collection of thinkers and designers, kindred spirits that I have found on my research journey. I am asking you to read and see how they resonate as a unified set. All images, unless otherwise identified in the reference section, are the work of Karin Amdal.
