Copyright is owned by the Author of the thesis. Permission is given for a copy to be downloaded by an individual for the purpose of research and private study only. The thesis may not be reproduced elsewhere without the permission of the Author.
Writing truth as non-violence

S. C. Webb
2011
Writing truth as non-violence

A thesis presented in partial fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of

Doctor of Philosophy
in Psychology

at Massey University, Palmerston North, New Zealand

Simon Christopher Webb
2011
Abstract

This thesis explores some of the ways violence can constrain, inform, and otherwise impact upon psychological theory, the ways psychological theory can contribute to various forms of violence, and some of the implications of this reflexive cycle. Arguing for non-violence as a truth criterion of psychological knowledge claims, the thesis sets out to question the conditions of possibility for producing non-violent psychological theory. Drawing upon contemporary theories of language, subjectivity, and power, it discusses technologies of truth production in terms of violence. The work of literary theorist and feminist post-structuralist philosopher Judith Butler is discussed in this context. After developing a set of theoretical resources for addressing reflexive epistemological problems of violence, some practice implications of non-violent psychological theory are considered in relation to the specific domain of forensic psychology. Returning to discussion of the broader theoretical issues, the thesis identifies some promising areas of focus for non-violent theory development. A key claim arising from this discussion is that the tradition of validity as representational accuracy or referential truth is closely linked to the prioritisation of power in many Western scientific, economic and other cultural enterprises. In this context psychology can emulate other sciences and produce technologies for more efficient control of subjectivity; but it can also use these technologies reflexively to address the desires embodied in its own pursuit of theoretical power, actively challenging the truth status of violent knowledge claims. The initial commitment to non-violent truth is now articulated as an argument that a commitment to forms of encounter with others that do not objectify those others involves a theoretical commitment to validating knowledge claims in terms of social justice. This calls into question the traditional hierarchy of “hard” and “soft” sciences, in which the truth claims of psychology and other social sciences are positioned as having to conform to the truth claims of natural sciences like physics and chemistry: a social epistemological framework positions psychological theory as a key resource for assessing the truth status of knowledge claims in other sciences. The thesis raises questions around this opportunity, both with respect to some of the details of its possible theoretical forms, and its possible political implications in academic, therapeutic and other contexts.
Acknowledgements

I am deeply grateful to Mandy Morgan and Leigh Coombes, for their encouragement and wisdom, and their substantial contribution to all aspects of this thesis from its inception and planning through to its eventual production. Massey University made the research a practical possibility through the financial support of a scholarship. Dear family and friends contributed in ways that may seem less obvious, but were very important. Thank you for your love and support, throughout the long years of study. E ngā mate, ngā aitu, ka tangihia e tātou i tēnei wā: haere, haere, haere.

Hutia te rito o te harakeke,
Kei hea te kōmako e kō?
Kī mai ki ahu, “He aha te mea nui o tēnei ao?”,
Māku e kī atu: “He tāngata, he tāngata, he tāngata!”
Table of Contents

Introduction ......................................................................................................................... 1
  Methodological questions in a context of violence.............................................................. 15
Reflexive Problems of Violence ............................................................................................ 34
  Direct physical harm ........................................................................................................... 35
  Indirect physical harm ......................................................................................................... 38
  Direct threat ...................................................................................................................... 42
  Indirect threat ................................................................................................................... 45
  Repression ....................................................................................................................... 49
  Foreclosure ...................................................................................................................... 52
  Epistemological terrorism ................................................................................................. 57
  Supremacist accounts ........................................................................................................ 66
  Catalysts for violence ....................................................................................................... 70
Judith Butler and Violence ..................................................................................................... 78
  Butler's Hegel .................................................................................................................... 86
  Performativity ................................................................................................................... 91
  Subjectivity ..................................................................................................................... 95
  Reflexivity ....................................................................................................................... 105
Legal and Criminal Violence .................................................................................................. 118
  Textual intelligibility: violent exclusions of readers........................................................ 135
  Nominal comprehensibility: violent inscriptions of persons........................................... 146
  Moral accountability: violent explanations of violence .................................................... 175
Discussion .......................................................................................................................... 194
  Paralogy .......................................................................................................................... 196
    From souls in prisons to souls as prisoners ................................................................. 205
    Philosophical zombies ................................................................................................. 209
  Alienation ....................................................................................................................... 212
    Mythos and logos ........................................................................................................... 221
    Philological zombies .................................................................................................... 224
Deconstructing good and evil............................................................................................... 230
  The Genesis account ...................................................................................................... 235
  Textual fetishism ............................................................................................................. 240
Veritas nos liberabit .............................................................................................................. 246
  Knowing facts versus knowing people ............................................................................ 250
  FAQ ................................................................................................................................. 252
Appendix ............................................................................................................................. 260
References ............................................................................................................................ 268