TAKING THE SPIRITS SERIOUSLY:
NEO-SHAMANISM AND CONTEMPORARY SHAMANIC
HEALING IN NEW ZEALAND

A thesis submitted in partial fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of

Doctor of Philosophy in Social Anthropology

at
Massey University
Auckland, New Zealand

(Irene) Dawne Sanson
2012
ABSTRACT

This thesis is a phenomenological and comparative study of contemporary shamanic healing and neo-Shamans in New Zealand. It considers neo-Shamanism as a complex of spiritual practices situated within a broad but identifiable cosmological sensibility, and as variable systems of healing. The relationships between neo-Shamans and some other new religious movements in New Zealand, and the similarities or differences between the practices of other neo- and indigenous shamans within a global context are examined. The discussion sits within a larger health and healing discourse about the relationships between neo-Shamanism, complementary and alternative medicine, and biomedicine amongst the medically pluralistic culture of New Zealand. It describes contemporary Māori healing as a possible variant of shamanism within local and global contexts; in particular, it examines the relationships between (some) neo-Shamans in New Zealand and (some) Māori healers.

I argue that modern Western shamans are synthesising and creating multiple 21st century forms of neo-Shamanisms, and that neo-Shamans in New Zealand are part of this emerging (re)construction process. However, neo-Shamans in New Zealand are also unique in that they live and practise in this land, which has led to them creating new spiritual identities as neo-Shamanic practitioners in New Zealand. I suggest that neo-Shamans in New Zealand do many of the things that indigenous shamans have always done and continue to do (such as entering altered states of consciousness), albeit within a particular modern Western cultural context. Moreover, I contend that neo-Shamans are challenging orthodox Western science as they engage in a sacred science that ‘takes the spirits seriously’ (Blain, 2002:74).

Secondly, I argue that many practitioners of complementary and alternative medicine consciously or unconsciously incorporate what might be regarded as shamanistic techniques and tools into their work, creating fusion models of healing. My observation is that the importation of shamanic healing practices into the West has contributed to these processes. I suggest that while at least some contemporary healers might be considered ‘shamans’ in disguise, nomenclature issues around whether or not they should be defined as shamans are less important than the fact that their healing practices have widened to include implicitly or explicitly a spiritual dimension.
Many have played a role in the birthing of this thesis. In particular, I give thanks to those who have generously contributed to my research as participants, sharing their shamanic and healing stories with me. It has been a privilege to sit with you in circle; your warmth and kindness have nurtured and inspired me.

The time I spent with the Māori healers has been a rich and humbling experience. Several Māori scholars and friends have advised and guided me during this part of my fieldwork. I am deeply grateful to you all. Nga mihi nui me te aroha nui ki a koutou, kia ora mō ō koutou awhina, me te manaakitanga hoki.

I thank my academic supervisors, Dr Kathryn Rountree and Dr Graeme Macrae, who have patiently encouraged and challenged me throughout this time. I am appreciative of their tactful and insightful guidance. The level of commitment the supervisory relationship demands is considerable, and I am privileged to have had their intellectual understandings, wisdom and experience that have enhanced the final product immeasurably.

A doctoral journey over several years must inevitably include pivotal life events and challenges; mine has been no different from many others in this respect. I acknowledge my extended family, and the passing of my brother and my mother during this time. I celebrate my daughters, Karla and Stephanie, and their partners Karim and Ravi. I give heartfelt thanks to my partner, Gavan, who has supported me in more ways than I can say over the last six years (including financial support), and has tolerated the times I have been unavailable or distracted.

Many dear friends have vicariously walked this path with me. You have cheered me on, listened, asked questions and shared with me on all levels. Thank you. In particular, I acknowledge and honour Anouk whose gentle midwifery skills have helped me in terms of my personal process throughout this time, and Julia who has helped me with formatting the final product.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

ABSTRACT ..................................................................................................................................i
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS ..................................................................................................... iii
TABLE OF CONTENTS ........................................................................................................... v
LIST OF TABLES AND PHOTOGRAPHS ........................................................................ xi

CHAPTER 1 — INTRODUCTION .................................................................................................1
Contextualising Neo-Shamanism Globally: Re-enchantment and Paradigm Shifts ...............3
Altered States, Ontological Shock and Other Ways of Knowing ...........................................7
Neo-Shamanic Cosmologies ....................................................................................................10
Personal Background ................................................................................................................11
Research Aims and Goals ........................................................................................................13
Significance of this Study .........................................................................................................14
Thesis Structure .........................................................................................................................16

CHAPTER 2 — SHAMANS AND NEO-SHAMANS: SPIRITUAL AND PSYCHIC EXPLORERS ..................................................................................................................19
From Shamans to Shamanism : The Dilemma of Definitions ...............................................19
The Shamanic Complex ............................................................................................................25
Cultures in Transition: A New Category of Shamans ............................................................28
New Spiritualities in the West: Neo-Shamans and Neo-Shamanism .....................................32
Core Shamanism .......................................................................................................................38
(Re)Constructing Shamanic Practices: Neo-Pagans and Neo-Shamans in Britain and Europe .................................................................................................................................42
Critiques of Neo-Shamans and Neo-Shamanism ..................................................................44
Literature on Neo-Shamanism in New Zealand .....................................................................48
Conclusion .................................................................................................................................50
CHAPTER 3 — STEPPING ONTO THE PATH: METHODOLOGY ........................................ 53
Positioning Myself in ‘The Field’ .................................................................................. 62
Meeting Neo-Shamans in New Zealand ..................................................................... 65
Introducing Key Participants ...................................................................................... 73
  Spirits as Participants ............................................................................................... 76
Ethical Considerations ............................................................................................... 77

CHAPTER 4 — MAPPING THE NEO-SHAMANIC LANDSCAPE IN NEW ZEALAND 85
Neo-Shamans, the New Age and Neo-Pagans ............................................................... 88
Native American Spirituality ....................................................................................... 94
The Local and the Global: Lineages, Influences and Demographics ....................... 97
  Spiritual and Physical Shamanic Lineages ................................................................. 99
  The ‘Homogenising’ Influence of Core Shamanism .................................................. 100
  Other Neo-Shamanic Influences .............................................................................. 102
  Demographics of Workshop Participants ............................................................... 104
Paths Towards Becoming a Neo-Shaman ................................................................. 107
Neo-Shamanic Identities and Community Roles ....................................................... 110
  Neo-Shamans and Community .............................................................................. 113

CHAPTER 5 — TAKING THE SPIRITS SERIOUSLY .................................................. 119
Neo-Shamanic Cosmologies ....................................................................................... 122
What is a Spirit? .......................................................................................................... 125
Spirits as Separate Entities ........................................................................................ 127
  Animate and Inanimate Objects ............................................................................. 129
Spirits as Energy .......................................................................................................... 132
Spirits as a Mental Construct ..................................................................................... 135
Spirits as Transpersonal Imaginal Beings ................................................................. 137
Spirits as a Practical Reality ...................................................................................... 140
Taking the Spirits Seriously ...................................................................................... 145
CHAPTER 6 — NEO-SHAMANIC PRACTICES.................................................................153
Creating Sacred Space, Entering Altered States of Consciousness .........................155
Shamanic Paraphernalia ..............................................................................................162
Neo-Shamanic Journeying: Intention and Presence .....................................................166
Neo-Shamanic Imagery ...............................................................................................170
Completion of the Ritual ............................................................................................173
Neo-Shamans in Nature ..............................................................................................177

CHAPTER 7 — MEDICAL PLURALISM IN NEW ZEALAND: SHAMANIC
HEALING, COMPLEMENTARY AND ALTERNATIVE MEDICINE, AND BIOMEDICINE ............................................................................................................185
Core Neo-Shamanic Concepts of Illness and Healing ...................................................187
  Diagnosis and Divination ..........................................................................................189
  Extraction of Spiritual Intrusions ............................................................................191
  Power Animal Retrieval and Soul Retrieval ............................................................194
Ecstasy and Enstasy, Sex and Gender in Shamanism ..................................................196
Nebulous and Shifting Boundaries: Shamanic Healing, Complementary and Alternative Medicine, and Biomedicine ......................................................................201
  Subtle Energies ........................................................................................................203
  Herbal Medicine ......................................................................................................207
  Neo-Shamanism and Psychotherapy ......................................................................208
  Shamanic Healing and Biomedical Practitioners ....................................................211

CHAPTER 8 — CONTEMPORARY MĀORI HEALING: TRADITIONS AND INNOVATION IN LOCAL AND GLOBAL CONTEXTS ..............................................217
Māori Cosmology, Spirituality and Healing ...............................................................220
Māori Healing Knowledge ..........................................................................................223
Categorising Māori Healers: Tohunga and Other Healers .........................................227
Contemporary Māori Healers ....................................................................................233
  Healing with Oratory and Performance ................................................................238
Contemporary Māori Healers in a Global Context ....................................................243
LIST OF TABLES AND PHOTOGRAPHS

Figure 6.1 Neo-Shamanic Altar ............................................................................................. 156
Figure 6.2 Neo-Shamanic Altar ............................................................................................. 157
Figure 6.3 Neo-Shamanic Drum and Drumstick ............................................................... 162
Table 7.1 Comparisons of Stages in Neo-Shamanic Healing and Charismatic Catholic Healing as Described by Csordas (1994, 2001) ......................................................... 192