Abstract

This exegesis reveals a practice that has been driven by making as the means to address questions concerning colour, space, form, time and site. From an initial desire to create a sustainable and self-generating painting practice, this text plots the development of a systematic method that uses data derived from choose-your-own-adventure books. As the system is deployed across a variety of sites, wall drawing and paper folding become the focus where the rules-based generation of form is fused with an intuitive sense of placement and use of colour. Further deployment explores the role of colour in response to site, the temporal nature of this work and its engagement with the viewer resulting in a response to architectural site.
