Copyright is owned by the Author of the thesis. Permission is given for a copy to be downloaded by an individual for the purpose of research and private study only. The thesis may not be reproduced elsewhere without the permission of the Author.
Identity Viewed Askew: A Debate with Special Reference to a Feminist Theological Organisation

A thesis presented in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in Sociology

Department of Social and Cultural Studies
Massey University, Albany
New Zealand

Chez Maree Leggatt-Cook
2005
Identity Viewed Askew: A Debate with Special Reference to a Feminist Theological Organisation

A critical task in the formation of any political group is the determination and articulation of group identity, purpose and goals. In holding that identity is impervious to capture, much poststructuralist thought has little to contribute to an understanding of the precise processes and ongoing tensions involved in such drives for representation. The essentialism debate in feminist theory, for instance, has been primarily concerned with determining which conceptualisation of women’s subjectivity will best facilitate feminism’s political goals. However, under the influential feminist deconstructive perspective, a dilemma emerges regarding how an anti-essentialist notion of femininity might be reconciled with the essentialism required for a distinctly feminist voice. Alternatively, post-Lacanian psychoanalysis views subjectivity as an effect of fundamentally irresolvable antagonisms in language, allowing the emphasis to shift from the (attempted) reconciliation of irresolvable tensions to the identification of mechanisms that work to conceal those tensions, thereby permitting a sense of subjectivity to be articulated.

This thesis explores the methodological implications of these theoretical debates, examining how the psychoanalytic line of questioning might be used to analyse feminist identity in an empirical setting. Research was conducted with the Women’s Resource Centre (WRC) based in Auckland, New Zealand, an organisation originally established to provide feminist theology resources to women undergoing theological education. Using a conversational methodology and the observation of material expressions of identity, the research attempts to view the Centre’s identity ‘askew.’

In doing so, it considers the creative yet eventually regressive impact of the postmodern privileging of difference and multiplicity on the feminist identity of the Centre. Referring specifically to the changing expression of the Centre’s identity (in promotional material, funding applications and the WRC Story), the thesis traces the effects of ideological tension (in incorporating more inclusive notions of justice with feminist politics) and organisational change (dispersion of the original community, high staff turnover, shift in organisational culture, funding difficulties). Wider implications of the research for voluntary and feminist organisations are indicated, along with an evaluation of post-Lacanian psychoanalysis for the empirical study of identity and for the overarching theoretical concerns of the thesis.
Acknowledgements

Without my supervisors, Associate Professor Ann Dupuis and Dr. Warwick Tie, this thesis would still be floating…somewhere – they helped me catch it! Always encouraging, they challenged me profoundly and guided me carefully, yet most important of all, they allowed me to find my own way. In fact, as a doctoral student, I do not think I could have hoped for more skillful, caring and generous supervisors. I feel privileged to know them and to count them among my friends. I would like a special acknowledgement to be made to Ann, who during the difficult final stages was quite literally an oasis of calmness and reason.

My husband, Colin Cook, has been with me through every high and low. He was, and is, my daily sustenance. What more need I say?

The committee, staff and members of the Women’s Resource Centre gave me permission to carry out research on the Centre, participated in the conversations, and accommodated the evolving nature of the research with grace. Quite simply, the research would have been impossible without their valuable input. In return, I hope my work has managed to capture something of the vision, energy and considerable achievement of the Women’s Resource Centre. Several women played particularly important roles in the research: Jean Brookes especially, willingly gave much of her time and attention to me. Others include Susana Carryer, Joanne Richdale, Lesley Utting, Rosemary Neave, Philippa Colgan, Megan Blakie, Janet Crawford and Ngaire Brader.

Each in their own way, my friends and family gave me the necessary support and encouragement I needed to complete this work. A few deserve special mention however, including Janet Bogle, who was the first person to interest me in dialectical thought, Ree Boddé and Joanne Richdale, whose engaging conversations proved so valuable for charting the confused wanderings of my thesis in its developmental stage(s), Amy Leggatt, my delightful and talented sister, PhD buddy Gordon Calleja, best cheerleader Kerri Challis, and finally, my chai-supplier and long-suffering flatmate Symon Blake.

Ethics approval was granted by Massey University Human Ethics Committee (MUHEC).
Because no thesis is an island, I dedicate mine to everyone I have acknowledged, but above all,

Colin

♥
Contents

1: Excursions in Identity: Introducing the Field of Study .............................. 1
   Introduction .......................................................................................................................... 1
   The Problem of Feminist Identity ...................................................................................... 2
   The Women’s Resource Centre .......................................................................................... 4
   Early Influences on the Development of the WRC
   The Growing Influence of Postmodernism: The WRC from the mid 1990s Onwards
   Recent Changes in the WRC
   Methodology .................................................................................................................... 10
   Implications of Multiplicity for Feminist Identity ........................................................... 13
   Theoretical Framework of Analysis .................................................................................. 15
   Structure of Thesis ............................................................................................................... 17

2: The Essentialism Debate in Feminist Theory ............................................. 19
   Introduction: The Dual Task of Feminist Theory ............................................................ 19
   Equality and Difference Feminism: The Critique of Essentialism.................................... 21
   Unravelling the Essentialism Debate ................................................................................ 29
   Conclusion ............................................................................................................................ 35

3: Woman as Other: The Deadlock of Deconstructive Criticism............... 37
   Introduction .......................................................................................................................... 37
   Undoing Philosophy: The Deconstructive Project ............................................................. 41
   Derrida’s Critique of Western Metaphysics
   The Movement and Supplementarity of Play
   Is There More to Deconstruction Than Subversion? The Radical Other and the Possibility of Meaning
   Feminist Appropriations of Deconstruction .................................................................... 55
   The Foundation of Phallogocentrism: The Excluded Woman
   The Dilemma of Feminist Deconstruction
   Concluding Comments ....................................................................................................... 65
4: The Subject is Real: The Role of Trauma and Enjoyment in Subjectivity .... 67

Introduction .......................................................................................................................... 67
The Žižekian View of Subjectivity ..................................................................................... 72
The Impossible-Real: The Inruption of Nonsense ........................................................... 80
Ideology in a Post-Ideological World................................................................................ 88
Concluding Comments ....................................................................................................... 96

5: The Significance of Style for an ‘Ideal’ Fit ........................................................ 99

Introduction: Defining the Space of Methodology.......................................................... 99
The Ideal Love Relationship............................................................................................... 102

The Women’s Resource Centre as the Object of Inquiry
Holding Hands with Žižek
In You I Live and Move and Have My Being
For and Against Theory: Struggles with Voice

Writing the Self: Reflections on Style in Scholarship...................................................... 111

The Fiction of Scholarly Writing
Me, Myself and My Object
Looking Awry

Concluding Comments ....................................................................................................... 117

6: Viewing Identity Askew: Practical Considerations in Doing Research ...... 119

Introduction.......................................................................................................................... 119
Key Dynamics in the Evolving Research Methodology ................................................. 120

Rationale and Conduct of Conversations
Viewing Askew

Ethical Conduct: Power Relations in Research ............................................................... 129

Conflict of Roles
Political Consequences and Implications for Reporting Back

Pulling the Methodology Together: Final Comments on Writing Research............... 133

7: Paradoxes of Women’s Resource Centre Identity ................................. 135

General Introduction to Analysis....................................................................................... 135
Introduction to Chapter 7 ................................................................................................. 136
The Formation of Women’s Resource Centre Identity: Emergence of the Mission Statement ........................................................................................................... 140

In the Beginning…
Recognising Identity: Emergence of the Object
The Anxiety of the Funding Relationship................................................................. 148
Mechanisms for Concealing Tension in WRC Identity........................................... 154

The Paradoxical Pursuit of Justice
Reliance on the Church: The Structure of the Forced Choice
A Further Paradox: A Split Core?
Concluding Comments: The Constitutive Exception of WRC Identity.............. 161

8: Telling Our Story: Cohering the Lived Experience of Identity ............. 166
Introduction ...................................................................................................................... 166
Tensions in the Containers of the WRC Story....................................................... 171
The Practice of Collective Story-telling................................................................. 177
The Status of Story-tellers: Tensions in WRC Community.............................. 184
Summarising Comments....................................................................................... 193

9: Recent Changes: The Emergence of the Monologue....................... 194
Introduction ...................................................................................................................... 194
Emergence of the Monologue.................................................................................. 200

Ritualised Explanation: Uncertain Context
Growing Tension between Key Objects of WRC Identity
Ritualised Explanation: Impact of Futurechurch
Changes to WRC Management and Governance Structures
Ritualised Explanation: Shortcomings of the Coordinator’s
Dispersal of WRC Community and Emergence of the Monologue
Consequences of the Monologue............................................................................. 218

Leadership and Follower-ship Styles
The Generation of Excessive Anxiety Regarding Context
Final Comments: The Re-Emergence of Story-telling at the 2004 AGM .......... 225

10: Concluding Comments: The Value of Viewing Identity Askew........... 229
Introduction ...................................................................................................................... 229
Challenges of Postmodern Identity .................................................. 230
Evaluation of Methodology and Consideration of Ethical Issues .......... 233
Wider Value of the Research: Contribution to Literature on Feminist and Voluntary Organisations ...................................................................... 235
Possibilities for Future Research............................................................ 241
Final Thoughts on the Value of Viewing Identity Askew ......................... 242

Bibliography............................................................................................. 244
List of Figures

Figure 1: Women’s Resource Centre Brochure................................................................. 136
Figure 2: “Key Relationships to the WRC.” Compiled at 2001 Planning Event .............. 166
Figure 3: WRC Labyrinth ............................................................................................... 182
Figure 4: 2004 WRC Brochure...................................................................................... 195
Figure 5: Diagram of WRC. Drawn for September 2003 Committee Meeting............... 196