Abstract

This thesis explores the structures of the Anglican Church between 1945 and 2012 at parish/local, diocesan/regional, and national/provincial levels and considers how they have evolved in the context of social life in New Zealand since the Second World War.

The period is divided into two parts, before and after 1975/1976. The first thirty years were ones in which the role of the church was largely accepted within the community. Prosperity in the 1950s and the baby boom benefited local congregations and parishes recorded higher levels of activity. Every parish was led by a resident priest who also discharged certain functions in the wider community. The dioceses were the major units of church life. They and their bishops jealously guarded their domain and the church resembled seven mini-denominations. The church was weak at national level: its general synod a small body which met only every three years. Its function as the 'representative and governing body' was interpreted narrowly. The primate's responsibilities were restricted. The church saw itself as part of the Church of England and, although constitutionally separate from the Mother Church, looked to it not only for guidance but as a source of supply for its bishops.

Societal changes beginning in the 1960s had a profound impact on the church, and statistical indicators moved downwards. Some sensed that the church had lost its way. That was reinforced by the conclusions of an international consultation in 1976 which highlighted the need for change and acted as a catalyst for many of the changes that followed. Belich's 'recolonising', 'Better Briton' and 'tight society' motifs are useful tools for interpreting the changes that took place. The church became more aware of its location in the Pacific, it asserted its independence, and was less reliant on ties with England. New models of ministry and parish life emerged as parishes found it more difficult to support stipendiary clergy. Parishes were given more authority although this threatened diocesan unity; a new form of 'congregationalism' emerged.

Demands for greater biculturalism led to a major revision of the constitution in 1992: a Three Tikanga church emerged. This gave the church a new shape, one that was significantly different from other national churches in the Anglican Communion.

Another debate followed: should the primate be one person or an instrument of diversity (shared by three archbishops)? This thesis focuses on the Pakeha stream of the church which struggled with its identity and failed to develop robust instruments of cooperation.

Anglican affiliation (measured at the census) declined from 37 to 14 percent between 1945 and 2006 but this was a measure of identity rather than involvement. Between 1976 and 2006 attendance declined by 15 percent but this was much lower than the 39 percent decline in affiliation. Attendance declined particularly in areas of population loss and where major immigration had taken place. Auckland suburbs became enclaves of various ethnicities with rates of Anglican affiliation ranging from three to 30 percent. The thesis introduces an ‘attendance quotient’: a measure of attendance related to census affiliation.

Acknowledgements

I acknowledge the support and encouragement I have received from so many over the past six years. In particular, I thank my supervisor, Professor Peter Lineham, who has been with me on this journey. His endless patience, good humour, and conversation have matched his academic prowess. He has constantly encouraged me to expand my topic and my understanding of the topic and for that I am most grateful. My co-supervisor, The Revd Dr Allan Davidson, has been both thorough and patient and I appreciate the conscientious way in which he read several versions of my chapters and made helpful suggestions. I count myself fortunate to have had, in Peter and Allan, two of this country's most eminent religious historians as my mentors. This thesis has been enriched by their contributions.

I thank the Trustees of the St John's College Trust Board for their significant financial support. Without it, it would not have been possible to undertake this project. I am mindful of the pressure they face each year allocating scholarship funds from limited resources. My thanks go to Paula Jakeman, administrator of Te Kotahitanga, who cheerfully processed my annual grant applications. I also thank Bishops John Paterson and Ross Bay for their support of my applications.

I acknowledge the hours of proof reading undertaken by my old friend, Dr George Marshall who, in a sense, inspired me to undertake doctoral research. George, a retired school principal, has a formidable understanding of English grammar, which he applied to this task with the help of a red pen!

My thanks also go to the staff of the John Kinder Theological Library whose patience, technical ability, and genuine interest in this project is much appreciated. My thanks to Judith Bright, Helen Greenwood, Jenny Harper, Anne Bartley, and Colenso Eramiha. I am also extremely grateful to the Massey University Library whose online and distance service is remarkable. Sadly, I cannot include names to these thanks, such is their anonymity. I also thank Jane Teal, Christchurch diocesan archivist, who obliged on several occasions, despite having to deal with earthquakes.

The staff of the various diocesan offices and some senior clergy were extremely helpful supplying statistical details and other pieces of information not otherwise available to me. In particular I thank: Jan Scott and Brian Allen (Auckland), Pamela Galbraith (Christchurch), Bishops George Connor and Kelvin Wright, Bronwyn Miller and Debbie Flintoff (Dunedin), Ian Pask and Deborah Oliver (Nelson), Adrienne Bruce, Cliff Houston, Belinda Barnhill, and Trish Truman (Waiapu), Denise Ferguson, Valarie Langley, Jackie Tappin, and Jill Schumacher (Waikato and Taranaki), and Bernard Faull, Alayne Ringrose, and Karen Stewart (Wellington). To these I add Michael Hughes (General Secretary) and Elizabeth Smaal (Inter-Diocesan Conference administrator).

My research also complicated the lives of our ecumenical partners and, in particular, I thank Dr Margaret Galt, Heather McKenzie, Sandra Homan and Jane Bloore (Presbyterian), Jo Smith (Methodist), and Anne Dickinson (Executive Officer of the NZ Catholic Bishops Conference). To give my research some international context I accessed a number of diocesan websites in Australia and Canada and in some cases sought clarification. My thanks to those who responded to these requests.

A number of other people willingly provided information and insights: Don Battley, Bishop John Bluck, Hugh Bowron, David Emanuel, Geoff Haworth, Noel Hendery, Harry Hicks, David Hilliard, Lawrence Kimberley, Stuart Lange, Warren Limbrick, John McCaul, Joyce Marcon, and Peter Stuart. The friendship of Dr Ross Armstrong is also deeply appreciated. The support and encouragement of family, friends and fellow parishioners in Howick meant a great deal.

My wife, Judith, has had the experience of being married to someone who had retired in one sense but not in another. She has a busy work life herself in addition to her roles as a wife, mother, grandmother, and daughter. It was to my great joy that we were recently able to spend three months in Europe partly on holiday but also while I worked as a locum priest in Heidelberg. That was one of the very best things we have ever done and I am grateful for the time we had together. It provided me with the necessary refreshment to complete this work.

I dedicate this thesis to the bishops and clergy, and lay members of synods and vestries who have faithfully served the church in New Zealand since the Second World War. I also honour those who inspired and encouraged me to study history in an academic setting.
