Scott LaFaro is widely regarded as a highly interactive bass player, and within the context of the Bill Evans Trio it is commonly believed he was able to cast aside the traditional time keeping role of the jazz bassist.

His considerable reputation seems to rest on this understanding, but as this exegesis aims to show, the general understanding of his legacy within jazz history is open to question.

More broadly, this exegesis highlights the fact that any claims about his legacy are supported by very limited analysis of his techniques and approaches, rendering any absolute portrayal of LaFaro misleading.

This exegesis aims to provide a thorough analysis of LaFaro’s performances within the Bill Evans Trio. By analysing a representative sample of his work in that context, I hope to discover common techniques and traits that LaFaro employed on a regular basis and which characterise his unique approach to bass playing within a small jazz ensemble.

With the identification of these characteristics, a clearer picture of Scott LaFaro can begin to emerge, as can a more accurate understanding of his legacy.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS:

I have been fortunate to work with some incredibly talented musicians over the course of this project. Enormous thanks go to Anita Schwabe and Roger Sellers for their brilliant musicianship, guidance and friendship. And to Chris Buckland and Lex French for expanding the trio’s scope!

Thanks also to Jemma Buckland for her eagle eye design and editing skills during the final stages of the thesis.

To Matthew Cave and Tom Warrington I owe a debt of gratitude for their continued friendship and guidance on our shared passion for all things bass. It was – and continues to be – a great adventure.

I have especially enjoyed the guidance, gentle advice and thought provoking dialogue provided by Norman Meehan as my academic supervisor.

I would like to thank my parents, Liz and Brett, and my brother Tristan for their absolute support and encouragement.

And finally the biggest thanks go to my wife Janina for her never failing support and love.
