Copyright is owned by the Author of the thesis. Permission is given for a copy to be downloaded by an individual for the purpose of research and private study only. The thesis may not be reproduced elsewhere without the permission of the Author.
CONCEPTUALISING
MIND, BODY, SPIRIT INTERCONNECTIONS:
perspectives of Māori and non-Māori healers

GLENIS TABETHA MARK
Ngapuhi, Tainui, Ngai Tahu

A thesis presented in partial fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Arts in Health Psychology

Massey University, Auckland,
New Zealand
2008
ABSTRACT

This study into the nature of the mind, body, and spirit aimed to enhance psychological understandings of the holistic nature of human beings. There is a focus in mainstream psychology on the biomedical model, which has a limited view of people, of health and illness. The biopsychosocial and biopsychosocialspiritual models of health and illness, and the Whare Tapa Wha and Te Wheke Māori cultural models encompass holism but there is little literature or research specifically on MBS interconnections.

Due to the difficulty of studying the mind, body, spirit according to scientific assumptions and methods, the interconnections between these three elements were explored through spiritual healers' understandings of spiritual healing practices. There were twelve participants, six indigenous Māori and six non-indigenous spiritual healers who participated in semi-structured interviews. The data was analysed using interpretative phenomenological analysis techniques.

Three specific questions about mind, body, and spirit interconnections conceptualisations were studied. The first research question focused on how spiritual healers conceptualise mind, body, spirit interconnections. The second research question considered how mind, body, spirit interconnections are understood by spiritual healers practices of spiritual healing. The last research question examined how a Māori cultural worldview influences spiritual healers' understandings of interconnections between the mind, body, and spirit.

The diversity of mind, body, spirit interconnections broadened and expanded on the sparse definitions in the literature by showing the use of the mind, body, spirit as both separate and combined elements. There were illustrations of the theoretical and practical use of mind, body, spirit interconnections in healing and in life. Cultural perspectives influenced and impacted on views of the mind, body, spirit with the addition of whānau and whenua to the mind, body, spirit concept that was considered culturally appropriate. The results provided a much broader picture than traditional models of health and illness, and showed further definitions and understandings of MBS interconnections. It is concluded that it is important that Māori cultural meanings of health and illness are included in the New Zealand health system.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Firstly, my thanks go to all the spiritual healers who agreed to be a part of this research. I have been privileged and honoured to spend time with each one of the healers and felt very humbled as they shared significant parts of their work and their lives with me. For this research could not have taken place without their participation and I was amazed by the many stories each person shared and was inspired by the conviction and confidence they have in their healing. If I had any regrets about this research at all, it was in having to omit much of the wonderful material from their interviews in order to focus on the research topic. I send much gratitude to each and every one of the spiritual healers who participated in this research.

The assistance of my research supervisors is gratefully acknowledged. Dr Mandy Morgan began with me on my postgraduate journey by supervising my mind, body, spirit special topic. I have been grateful for her genuine interest in this subject, her gentle guidance that helped me to focus my ideas and her sincere encouragement and support from the beginning. Dr Antonia Lyons has fully supported me throughout this research. She has been an invaluable help with administrative processes and I have greatly appreciated her editorial genius, her skilful ability to explain concepts clearly and her insightful advice at each step along the way. My greatest thanks and blessings to you both as I would never have been able to achieve this thesis without either of you.

I would also like to thank my family and friends for their continued support throughout my research and especially my many health issues. I acknowledge and thank all who have participated and shared in various aspects of this research. I believe there is a connectedness between us all and this has fuelled my motivation to complete this research into the mind, body, spirit.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

Abstract ......................................................................................................... ii

Acknowledgments.......................................................................................... iv

List of Tables and List of Figures.................................................................... vii

Chapter One: Conceptualising Mind, Body, Spirit: an introduction .......................... 1
  Mind, Body, Spirit ................................................................................. 2

Chapter Two: Spiritual Healing and Healers ................................................... 15
  Complementary and Alternative Therapies ............................................ 15
  Spiritual Healing: an introduction ....................................................... 17
  Spiritual Healers .................................................................................. 19

Chapter Three: Indigenous Perspectives on the Mind, Body, Spirit .................. 25
  Health, Illness and Disease .................................................................. 26
  Māori Perspectives ............................................................................. 28
  Healing ................................................................................................. 30
  Indigenous Spiritual Healers ............................................................. 31
  Māori Healing and Healers ................................................................... 32
  Purpose of Research ........................................................................... 34

Chapter Four: Mind, Body, Spirit Research Process ........................................ 36
  Introduction to Interpretative Phenomological Analysis ......................... 36
  Research Procedures ........................................................................... 39
  Data Collection .................................................................................... 42
  Reflexivity .............................................................................................. 48
  Data Analysis ....................................................................................... 51

Chapter Five: Healers' Conceptualisations of Mind, Body, Spirit
  Interconnections ................................................................................... 54
  Considerations during analysis ............................................................. 55
  Mind, Body, Spirit themes .................................................................... 56
  Results ................................................................................................. 58

Chapter Six: Māori Healers' Conceptualisations of Mind, Body, Spirit
  Interconnections .................................................................................. 90
  Mind, Body, Spirit themes .................................................................... 90
  Results .................................................................................................. 92
  Māori Cultural Conceptual Model ....................................................... 125
Chapter Seven: Conclusions and Considerations .................................................. 128
Research Questions ......................................................................................... 128
Research Conclusions and Implications ......................................................... 132
Research Considerations .............................................................................. 137

Appendix I: Interview Schedule ..................................................................... 147
Appendix II: Information Sheet ......................................................................... 148
Appendix III: Participant Consent Sheet ............................................................ 150
Appendix IV: Authority for the Release of Tape Transcripts Form ................. 151
Glossary of Māori words ................................................................................ 152
References ........................................................................................................ 154
LIST OF TABLES

Table 1: All participants' gender, ethnicity and location data.........................40

Table 2: Descriptions of spiritual methods mentioned most frequently across all participating healers.................................................................................41

Table 3: MBS interconnection themes from Māori and non-Māori spiritual healers' interviews ..................................................................................................58

Table 4: MBS interconnection themes from Māori spiritual healers' interviews 92

LIST OF FIGURES

Figure 1: Te Whetu (The Star) Māori cultural HTWWW (or MBSFL) conceptual model of health and well-being.................................................................128