Abstract

This research explores the experiences of young people, youth leaders, villager elders/leaders, parents of teenagers, and government workers in Goroka, Papua New Guinea (PNG), to facilitate further understanding of youth development approaches and strategies. The study in particular investigates the possibility of establishing a link between relevant traditional youth upbringing methods and the positive youth development approaches emerging from the Western world. Positive youth development approaches are those strength-based approaches that promote young people’s capabilities to learn and strive in the diverse settings they live, in contrast to the conventional youth development approaches which addresses immediate youth problems.

The National Youth Policy of PNG focuses on involving young men and women in meaningful activities in social, spiritual, political, and cultural development through participation in the affairs of their families and communities. The results of the research indicated that the Youth Policy’s objectives were never fully implemented in Goroka. This may have contributed to the numerous problems encountered by young people that include: confusion between traditional and modern cultures, poverty and hardship, drug and alcohol abuse, prostitution, theft, and unemployment. The enormous efforts by schools, churches, government departments, donors, and youth-oriented organisations to deal with youth issues seemed inadequate in relation to the contemporary youth population.

It is evident that conventional youth development approaches have failed to educate young people that it is a viable option to return home and become productive citizens. Thus alternative youth development approaches have to be found to assist these youth. This finding points to a need to establish a link between traditional culture, whereby the whole community takes responsibility for guiding young men and women through the transition to adulthood, and positive youth development. It suggests further research should be conducted to determine how this might be achieved by building upon the existing youth development approaches and strategies.
Acknowledgements

There are many great people who assisted in the completion of this thesis. Firstly, my heartfelt gratitude goes to my two supervisors, Dr. Maria Borovnik and Associate Professor Regina Scheyvens for their encouraging words, guidance, and critical feedback on my thesis drafts. I also appreciated Melanie and Kim’s proof reading skills for some of my draft chapters.

Secondly, I would like to acknowledge all the research participants for their time and contributions, and in sharing their invaluable knowledge and experiences with regard to my research aim. In particular, I wish to thank Mr. Javono and staff of the Division for Community Development in Goroka for their tremendous support. Also, thanks to Dr. Nime Kapo (CVO-PNG) for accommodation and ‘Farake Boys’ for hospitality in my 4 weeks of fieldwork in Goroka.

Thirdly, I extend my sincere gratitude to my three financial sponsors: the New Zealand Government for awarding me the New Zealand Development Scholarship - Open Category, for two years postgraduate study; Massey University through the School of People, Environment and Planning Graduate Research Fund; and my employer, the Eastern Highlands Provincial Administration, PNG. This study would not have been possible without them.

Lastly, I have heaps of praises for my family, Mila, and friends, for your enormous support in my crucial moments of study, which have urged me to complete this writing. I admired you guys and the good Lord GOD be with you.
