ABSTRACT

This research report examines the empowerment approach within the Gender and Development (GAD) discussion, providing an emphasis on women's empowerment as an instrument of post-conflict reconstruction in post-Taliban Afghanistan. Utilising a comprehensive literature review, the report establishes the framework of Naila Kabeer as a consistent base for the comparing and contrasting of two gender-focussed development programmes in Afghanistan. The contextual background of empowerment programmes pursued over the past decade in Afghanistan are presented with an examination of the challenges and opportunities encountered pursuing women's political, economic, social and psychological empowerment. A specific consideration of the New Zealand-led Provincial Reconstruction Team in Bamyan Province, Afghanistan, and the Community Development Council initiative within the Afghanistan National Solidarity Programme is undertaken. The report concludes that while there have been enormous symbolic advances for women's political empowerment in the national sphere, the more private and local the sphere examined: the less decision-making agency Afghani women are empowered to exercise. While seeking to provide opportunities for women's economic empowerment the programmes have made little practical change to women's income or financial agency. The two gender-focussed programmes examined have made significant compromises to the extremities of the local context, and are considered 'gender accommodating' rather than 'gender transformative'. The large body of literature concerning Afghanistan substantiates that the road to gender equity will stretch across the generations and is necessarily gradual to remain sustainable. As Afghanistan enters further political turmoil, the empowerment attained by Afghani women in the past decade must be expressly guarded.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The completion of this report would have been impossible without the strong guidance and responsive advice of my supervisor Doctor Rochelle Stewart-Withers; I would like to take this chance to thank Rochelle for taking the time to put my work on track and giving me a clear sense of the expectations invested in this research report. Thank you Rochelle, your encouragement at vital stages pulled this project through from a tentative dream to a reality.

Furthermore, this report would not have been possible without the timely guidance and advice of Professor Regina Scheyvens, the Head of School and Staff of the Massey University Institute of Development Studies. Regina, your commitment to the integrity of the Development Studies Programme at Massey University is an inspiration; I hope that this report reflects the genuine effort and commitment you quite rightly expect from members of the Development Studies post-graduate programme.

I am indebted to the financial support and understanding of the two workplaces where I have been employed whilst undertaking this research report. Firstly, to Rebecca White, Manager of the Risk Assessment Team (RAT) at Immigration New Zealand, Ministry of Business, Innovation and Employment; your support in undertaking the first sections of this report was invaluable, as was the literature sitting with the library team. Special mention also goes country research librarian Kate Riddick for your contacts in the development field, as well as your forgiveness regarding my misunderstanding of prompt and correct book return.

In this regard I must also thank Dave Sayers, Manager of the Charities Services Compliance Unit at the Department of Internal Affairs for his understanding of the time needed to compile this research report while our team faced and continues to face an enormous mountain of urgent and challenging work. I appreciate how difficult it has been to grant me the time to devote to this report.

Thank you to my parents Judy and Geoff for always believing in me. Finally, special mention must go to my 'mothers in outlaw', Sharon Rogers and Susie Brown. Sharon your support and belief is wild yet unwavering. Of course, my greatest thanks will always belong to my wonderful partner Jenna for being the most hilarious and supportive partner in crime on the planet.
