Copyright is owned by the Author of the thesis. Permission is given for a copy to be downloaded by an individual for the purpose of research and private study only. The thesis may not be reproduced elsewhere without the permission of the Author.
DEDICATION

For

SARAH MARY SPEIGHT RUSTON

born 25-4-84 died 10-2-93

and

LUCY ROSE GASQUOINE MCMASTER

born 2-8-94

You have taught me more than I ever expected there was to know about caring for and caring about children and their families.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

ABSTRACT .......................................................................................... ii
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS ...................................................................... iii
KEY TO TRANSCRIPTS ....................................................................... iv

CHAPTER ONE:
INTRODUCTION AND OVERVIEW ................................................ 1
THE PROFESSIONAL CONTEXT ..................................................... 2
THE PERSONAL CONTEXT ............................................................. 4
THE FAMILY-CENTRED CARE PHILOSOPHY .................................. 6
STUDY OVERVIEW ......................................................................... 12

CHAPTER TWO:
LITERATURE REVIEW ................................................................... 14
HISTORICAL CONTEXT .................................................................. 16
NEW ZEALAND RESEARCH .......................................................... 19
INTERNATIONAL RESEARCH
Measuring parental stress and anxiety ............................................. 22
Descriptions of parents' experiences .............................................. 24
Parenting or Mothering and Fathering ......................................... 28
Mothering chronically ill children .................................................. 30
The nursing perspective ................................................................. 33
SUMMARY ...................................................................................... 35

CHAPTER THREE:
RESEARCH METHOD AND DESIGN ............................................. 36
STUDY METHOD
Nursing research and phenomenology .......................................... 37
Heideggerian phenomenology ...................................................... 40
The hermeneutic circle ................................................................. 41
Van Manen's phenomenological method ..................................... 44
STUDY DESIGN
Ethical considerations ................................................................. 48
Study participants ......................................................................... 52
Participant profiles ....................................................................... 53
Data collection ............................................................................... 57
Data analysis ................................................................................. 60
ABSTRACT

This phenomenological study describes the lived experience of mothering a child hospitalised with acute illness or injury. Seven mothers who had experienced this crisis within twelve months of our first interview agreed to share their stories with me. The resulting data were analysed and interpreted using van Manen's interpretation of Heideggerian phenomenology.

Four phenomenological themes emerged from this study. Mothers have a special kind of knowing. They have a need to do with and for their child. Handing over to or leaving their child in the care of strangers and waiting for their child to be returned to their care are very difficult things for mothers to do. Their constant vigilance is enabled by their special kind of knowing and their need to do. The difficulty of handing over, leaving and waiting is emphasised by mothers' constant vigilance.

Personal experiences during the course of my study presented significant challenges to my ability to offer an effective phenomenological description of the phenomenon under study. Continuous reflection aided by dialogue with fellow phenomenological researchers has resulted in a meaningful narrative.

This description of mothering in a context of crisis is useful in the potential contribution it makes to nurses' understanding of mothers' experience of the hospitalisation of their children. It supports the philosophy of family-centered care and highlights the ability of individual nurses to make a positive difference to a very stressful experience.
Without the support and interest in this project of many people it would not have begun, let alone have been completed. I need to acknowledge the following people particularly for the very special contribution they have made to my research.

John McMaster, Margaret Gasquoine and Bert Salmon for never failing in your belief that this was a very important thing for me to do.

Helen and Deb, Nell, Cyn, Des, Yve, Lyn and Jos, the mothers who participated in this study, for the privilege of sharing your stories.

Jo Walton, my thesis supervisor, for your unwavering confidence in me.

Liz Smythe, Deb Spence and Elizabeth Niven for sharing so much of this journey of doing phenomenology.
KEY TO TRANSCRIPTS

In the presentation of research findings, and particularly in relation to excerpts from research interviews and field notes, the following abbreviations and conventions have been used:

italics the words used by the study participants themselves names all study participants and their children are identified by the use of pseudonyms

I Interview

p page

(parentheses) researcher questions or comments made during interviews

[square brackets] are used when a clarifying or explanatory comment has been added by the researcher

... pause contained in original material

..//.. material edited out of interview