I owe a great deal to my supervisor, Basil Poff. I found his understated erudition and breadth of understanding quite inspirational, and his gentle criticism drove me to great lengths in an effort to earn approval. I also acknowledge the interest and guidance of Dr. Kerry Taylor, who set me straight on several occasions in the early stages of settling on this topic. In fact, Massey's history programme has been superb and has lent new intellectual life to an aging school teacher.

I also acknowledge the opportunity given to me by the Teacher Study Award scheme which gave me six months away from work to focus on this thesis. The luxury of being paid to study seemed almost sinful.

The PPTA was very helpful from the outset, and in particular, I thank Lynette O'Brien, Research Officer at head office, for her assistance and interest.

Finally, I thank my wife, Gilda Mortimer, for her encouragement and her ideas. The whole project required something of a recontextualisation of our domestic life and she tolerated my preoccupation more than I deserved.
