Abstract

Most social workers today learn about and adhere to international and national commitments which specify social justice as an integral part of social work ethics and values. This research focuses on how eight Aotearoa/New Zealand recent social work graduates (2000-2010) understand social justice and how they integrate it into their social work practice. The study explores whether barriers exist in implementing social justice into social work practice on both a personal and structural level, and if so, what they are.

The study is qualitative, utilising a critical ethnographic methodology and a critical theoretical framework. Data collected through the use of focus groups and in-depth interviews is examined with a thematic analytical approach.

Analysis identified seven themes which showed that social justice was primarily understood as being able to work for change on a structural level. The themes also highlighted the existence of a number of barriers to the integration of social justice into practice. These barriers were in two key areas, the workplace and the organisation of social work. All participants were in strong agreement regarding these barriers.

These findings strongly support previous literature and research which identify a disjuncture for social workers between the definition and practice of social work in a number of areas, particularly in an environment dominated by neoliberal ideology. The concord between participants in this study and the similarity of the findings to data within earlier research suggests that the social work community is facing an ongoing and serious difficulty in ensuring social work is able to fulfil its ethical commitments and protect its workers as they work for social justice.

Based on this research five recommendations are made to develop and support the social work community.

Acknowledgments

As with any achievement in life, this thesis is far more than the work of one individual. It is the culmination of a lot of learning, support, inspiration and patience provided by a range of people. I cannot mention everyone and given that all my friends had to tolerate my rants, general unavailability and obsessiveness that seems inadequate but thanks so much!

I want to acknowledge a few really special people that stick in my mind as invaluable:

To my omniscient, extraordinarily patient, yet fiery partner Kara, I could not have done this (or remained sane) without you. I love you and the way you look at the world.

Thank you so much.

To my father Bruce, whose influence has not been felt just in this work, but throughout my entire life. I want to acknowledge your tenacity, intelligence and generosity to me, even at the most difficult of times, you were endlessly patient. I love you.

To my social work predecessors, some of whom are famous, some who will never be known. Thank you all for laying the path and passing the fight to me. I do not forget.

To my supervisors Mary Nash and Lareen Cooper, almost the perfect yin/yang pair! Thank you for pushing me, guiding me, challenging me and accepting my challenges. This could not have been achieved without you, and I have learned so much!

To those who partook in this study, your thoughts, energy, passion and humour epitomise all I love about social workers. Thank you so so much. Kia Kaha.

Last but of course not at all least, to my friend Elka who shows me and the whole world if they would care to look, what it truly means to have an open mind. A rare and precious thing- just like you! Thanks for showing me the best of human nature.
