Abstract
Psychotherapy for clients is an interpersonal, often emotional, process facilitated under guidance from their therapist. Whilst the literature offers some tantalising clues as to which therapist-emotional qualities are beneficial for establishing good working relationships, which tend to lead to positive client change, little is known about which specific emotional skills successful therapists use to achieve this process. The purpose of the present study was to gain insight into how excellent therapists use their emotion in therapy to help clients achieve positive outcomes. Three therapists with high client outcome ratings engaged in semi-structured interviews, and resulting transcripts were analysed using interpretative phenomenological analysis. Participants spoke of genuine congruence in warmth and caring characteristics; sensitivity to client needs; harbouring positive expectations of their therapeutic methods and clients; possessing strong self-reflective and emotion regulation skills; often experiencing strong empathy but moderating their empathic expression; balancing the client relationship and therapeutic process; working collaboratively with their clients; and prioritising client emotional needs over their own. Implications, study limitations and future directions for research are discussed.
Acknowledgements

To my wife, Catherine de Vries – for all your support and encouragement over the last six years of studies and thesis work, and taking care of everything else while I was absorbed. You are my rock.

To my mother, Helena Harrison – for your support, enthusiasm, passion for psychology, and valuable insights into theory and research. You are my inspiration.

To my supervisors, Dr. Shane Harvey and Dr. Don Baken, for your assistance over the last year, and for giving your valuable time for supervision.

Last but not least, a grateful thank you to the participants who shared their knowledge and experience in taking part in this study. Thank you for your time and effort.
