"To Be Free in Our Country": Fighting the \textit{Kulturkampf} With Tzerie Meretz

A dissertation presented in partial fulfilment of the requirements for the degree PhD In Social Anthropology

At Massey University, Turitea Campus, Palmerston North New Zealand

Dominic Michael Patrick Moran

2004
Israeli society is deeply divided along religious-secular lines in a manner characteristic of kulturkampf. This dissertation discusses the role of the Meretz political party in this struggle, building on ethnographic research carried out with the youth sections of the party in 1999 and 2000 and subsequent peace activism. The history and nature of the Jewish kulturkampf are charted and described, as is the development of the secular Jewish identity community. Interview excerpts are used to elucidate the understandings and experience of culture war and Jewish identification from the standpoint of committed secular activists. Finally, predictions are made for the future trajectory of the kulturkampf.

Acknowledgements

I would like to thank my friends in Tzerie and Noar Meretz who worked with me through the research process and in campaigning and who taught me so much. This dissertation is ultimately for you and I hope that you see some of yourselves in these pages. Todah robah, robah! I would also like to acknowledge the support of my supervisors Jeff and Keith over the years and of my editors, Noeline, Meirav and Diana. Thank you also to my parents who supported me when the government thought better of it. Lastly, I would like to thank my wife Sharon and son Yuval for their loving support during the writing process.

This dissertation is dedicated to the memory of my mother Bernadette.
